

AURAS

The living color spectrum

By: Pamela R. Nine-Gladstone, Ph.D.

Did you know that every life form is surrounded by an aura? The aura is an etheric cloud-like formation made up of electromagnetic energy which radiates around all living entities. It is an intricate and complex system which provides constant interaction with the higher universal life force. The inner core of the aura is where the very essence of our existence lies.

The aura represents a chronicle of one's life. It reveals past-life, present-life and even futuristic information relating to conditions and events still yet to occur. By studying the aura and its functions, we can increase our understanding of ourselves and our capacity to lead more prosperous, healthy and fulfilling lives.

The aura is known as "the living color spectrum." It contains layers of colors from the rainbow's seven rays (Red, Orange, Yellow, Green, Blue, Indigo and Violet). The colors found in an aura are just as unique, as the person it surrounds. Colors within the aura are interpreted using color theory methods based on the scientific fact that color is "pure light energy", and each color has a different frequency. Another scientific fact is that light stimulates the body's endocrine system, which is associated with and connected to the chakra system.

The chakra system contains seven major chakras. The seven major chakras are: the Root, Sacral Plexus, Solar Plexus, Heart, Throat, Brow or Third Eye, and Crown. There are also minor and secondary chakras. Chakras are spinning vortex energy centers which are connected to all bodily organs, systems and functions, and are also associated with the seven rainbow colors - like the aura.

Often, when the topic of auras, is discussed, people are most familiar with the first discovered and developed aura photography technology of Russian scientist, Seymon Kirlian. Kirlian's work initially gained attention in the west, during the early 1960's. The still-used Kirlian photography technique involves photographing humans, plants, and even small groupings of cells, in the presence of a high-frequency, high-voltage, low-amperage-electrical field using an instant-image type camera. The developed image then shows glowing, multicolored emanations around the subject, which are representative of the aura.

Over the years, aura photography technology has made vast improvements and now more advanced aura - chakra photo imaging systems are available. The advanced aura systems of today range upwards in price from ten to fifteen thousand dollars. Advanced systems measure electro-dermal activity and electrical conductivity in the body using a highly sensitive magnetic hand sensor device. The bio-data transferred from the hand sensor device is then analyzed and processed by a state-of-the-art analysis program, and correlated into personalized in-depth biofeedback data reports, intricate graphs, and personalized color printed aura-chakra photographs.

Although auras are invisible to the eyes of many, it is common for the aura and chakra energies to be visually seen and sensed intuitively by individuals who possess highly sensitive perception abilities. In fact, many children have the ability to see auras and sometimes demonstrate this unique gift through artwork. Children who see auras will often draw their human subjects in vivid colors, extending the colors above or around them.

Most everyone has had occurrences of sensing another person's aura by simply feeling a presence near, and then turning to find someone there.

For those who do not readily see or sense the aura, there are techniques available that can assist in developing aura viewing and sensing skills. Aura viewing is like any other skill, it requires a disciplined practice. As one refines the ability to see or sense the aura, knowledge of its complete system must also be learned in order to properly interpret the colors and attributes of the aura.

The size, shape and colors of an aura are all unique to the person it surrounds. The intensity and location of the colors within the aura provide essential information pertaining to all levels of the physical, mental, emotional and spiritual body.
